In the 1970s, New Orleans Public Schools established three Adolescent Service Centers (ASC) apart from the traditional school setting, to work with students who were disruptive or leaning to probable suspension. Students attending classes at the centers were provided with programs tailored to their emotional, social and educational needs. The Centers were under the supervision of the Division of Instruction and Child Advocacy. The series contains correspondence, reports and grant proposals originating from ASC. For additional information see also “Juliana Boudreaux.”
